the case was the fact that the woman's husband and the two brothers of the man stood near and watched the affair.

Mrs. Hendricks believed that Rolfe had uttered remarks about her that were slanderous. She determined to be revenged, and to-day, after taking her husband's dinner to him, she purchased a rawhide at a hardware store and informed her husband that she intended to chastise Rolfe. Hendricks agreed to accompany her. Rolfe is employed in lumber yard, and had to pass the corner mentioned on his way to his dinner. Mrs. Hendricks took up her position beside the electric-light pole on the corner and waited. A few minutes later Rolfe and his two brothers approached, and the streets were filled with men hastening home to their dinners.

As Rolfe drew near Mrs. Hendricks stepped in front of him and began to belabor him with the whip, at the same time screaming that she would teach him to call her wife names. Before Rolfe could collect his faculties sufficiently to try to escape, he received several blows over the head and face. When he tried to get away the whip was brought down on his back repeatedly. Rolfe told the woman that he would have her arrested if she continued to hit him, but she paid no attention. She said that he might have her arrested if he wanted to, but she would teach him to talk in front of her first. Finally, Hendricks

Mrs. Hendricks said she had been slandered and Role was the offender. She said that she did not care if she was arrested. She intended to tie a ribbon about the whip she had used and hang it on the wall as a warning to slanderers.
